- Introduction -

The archive records from the Terezín ghetto (24 November 1941 – 8 May 1945, and from the period after the liberation) are preserved only in fragments.

Only a portion of the documents in the collection are connected with the official activities of the Terezín Council of Elders and with the various departments and sections of its self-government. The first group of documents comprise a relatively diverse range of maps, plans and drawings of the ghetto, the surrounding area, the housing blocks and buildings, various sketches of the facilities and equipment, as well as notices.

The collection also includes a small group of various official books, mostly of an economic nature (daybooks, lists of supplies, orders for goods, alphabetical index of suppliers, accounting journal, warehouse journal, journal with records of the sick, directory of offices in the ghetto, chronological index of the names of prisoners).

The second, more extensive group of documents is connected with the personal activities of Terezín prisoners and with their daily life in the ghetto. This includes literary work (poetry, prose, translations) by children and adults, diaries and albums, music scores, magazines and various related texts, as well as several scripts for theatre plays (e.g. cabaret, which was very popular in the ghetto), some of which are incomplete. Programmes and guides to cultural events, along with invitation cards and entrance tickets, have also been preserved.

Another important group of items are the personal papers of Terezín prisoners. This includes a whole series of documents related to daily life in the ghetto, such as postcards that were written to or received from loved ones and friends, as well as confirmation receipts of packages, permits to send packages and permit stamps, which at certain times enabled friends and relatives of specific prisoners to send packages to the ghetto.

A wide range of documents are related to the daily life and work of the prisoners. These include, for example, food tokens, passes, medical cards, Terezín bank notes and 'savings books', various official notifications and permits concerning individual prisoners, internal correspondence within the ghetto, invitation cards and entrance tickets for cultural events.

Some groups of documents, particularly relating to the personal activities of prisoners are covered in more detail in the annex to the inventory. This includes primarily material that was written for various types of public and semi-clandestine cultural activities in the ghetto. Most of these groups of documents are arranged alphabetically according to the authors' names, as are the personal papers.

Among the official documents is a group of records from autumn 1941, a period when the Nazi authorities were looking for a place to gather the Protectorate Jews. At the time, none of the staff of the Prague Jewish Religious Community suspected that this place would only be a temporary abode for most of the Jews. They hoped in vain that the Jews of Bohemia and Moravia would be protected from deportation to the East if a ghetto site were to be promptly selected and established within the Protectorate. In the belief that the Jews would provide an important source of labour for the Nazi authorities, they suggested sites that were located near the main industrial centres with good transport connections. Some of the proposals drafted by staff of the Prague Jewish Religious Community at this time, together with the minutes from their meetings with the representatives of the Central Office for Jewish Emigration (Zentralstelle für jüdische Auswanderung) – the main co-ordinator to which the community was answerable – have been preserved.

The last collection of original documents comprises records from the period after the liberation; these are not arranged according to the registry files from the ghetto period. They include documents concerning life in Terezín after the liberation, the typhoid epidemic, repatriation and voluntary work by former prisoners who saw to the running of the ghetto until its final liquidation at the end of August 1945. A small portion of the documents were later added to the collection from the personal papers of Jiří Vogl [Georg Vogel], who headed the ghetto after its liberation.

The collection includes post-war testimonies from former Terezín prisoners. This group of documents is also arranged alphabetically by name of inmate. Some of the material includes accounts of personal experiences, often providing detailed descriptions of life and conditions at various times in the ghetto. Other records provide only brief information, which was obtained shortly after the war for the purposes of documentation.

The Terezín Archive Collection was put together and inventoried in 1969/70. Many of the documents in this collection are not connected with official activities in the ghetto. The collection was continually supplemented with large numbers of documents, which led to the inclusion of new groups of items. A new inventory was subsequently prepared, including a name index. The collection includes original records and copies.

The first transport (Ak – Aufbaukommando, or construction detail) left Prague for the Terezín ghetto on 24 November 1941. Included in this transport were the then Prague-based staff of the first Terezín Elder Dr. Jakub Edelstein. Subsequently, transports from the whole of the Protectorate were regularly dispatched to the ghetto. Most of the Protectorate Jews – more than 73,000 people – passed through Terezín. German and Austrian Jews were deported to the Terezín ghetto from June 1942 onwards, later followed by transports from Holland, Denmark and Slovakia.

The idea that expediting the establishment of the ghetto would protect the Jews of Bohemia and Moravia from deportations to the East proved to be mistaken. As early as 9 January 1942, the first transport of 1,000 inmates – bound for Riga – left the ghetto. Deportations to the East continued at irregular intervals until 28 October 1944. In total, around 140,000 people were deported to the Terezín ghetto, from where just short of 87,000 were sent on to the East. Only a few of these survived.

The Terezín ghetto had a special status among the other Jewish ghettos that the Nazi authorities set up in occupied Europe. It was passed off as a haven for elderly German Jews. In reality, however, it became a huge transit camp and gateway to the death camps in the East. Later on, the Terezín ghetto also served to deceive the world, as it was presented as a place where its residents lived well and from where no transports were dispatched. This was why the International Red Cross was invited to inspect the ghetto. Prior to the visit, many improvements (Stadtverschönerung – “beautification of the city”) were made over the course of several months, and the route to be taken by the Red Cross representatives was carefully selected. Among other things, the ghetto was renamed a ‘Jewish settlement’, the streets were given proper names, and a bandstand was erected in one of the parks, which was otherwise off-limits to the inmates.

The International Committee of the Red Cross came to the ghetto on 23 June 1944. In its report, which accommodated the wishes of the Nazis, the delegates stated that the inhabitants of Terezín were faring well and that no transports were being dispatched from there. One month earlier, 7,500 prisoners – including many of the elderly, sick and orphans – had been sent to Auschwitz, so that Terezín would not be seen as an overcrowded ghetto full of wretched figures. After the Red Cross inspection, the makeshift alterations were exploited in a propaganda film. Deportations to Auschwitz resumed in September 1944.

The Terezín ghetto had three basic functions. Firstly, it was used as an extermination site (a quarter of all prisoners died in Terezín), secondly it served as a transit camp (most of the prisoners were deported to the East), and thirdly it provided a means of propaganda to deceive the world (for example, in connection with the Red Cross visit).

Throughout its existence, the ghetto was headed by the Jewish Council of Elders, a sham self-governing body that was entirely dependent upon the will and decision of the camp commander. The first chairman of the council in November 1941 was Jakub Edelstein (shot dead in June 1944 in Auschwitz), who was replaced in January 1943 by Dr. Paul Eppstein, who held the post until September 1944 (he was later shot dead in the Terezín Small Fortress). The last chairman was Dr. Benjamin Murelstein, who survived the Holocaust.

The position of camp commander (under the Prague-based Zentralstelle für jüdische Auswanderung – the Central Office for Jewish Emigration for Bohemia and Moravia, later re-named the Central Office for the Settlement of the Jewish Problem in Bohemia and Moravia) was also held at different times by three leaders: between November 1941 – July 1943 by Dr. Siegfried Seidl (executed after the war in Austria), between July 1943 and February 1944 by Anton Burger (died in 1991, escaped capture) and, lastly, by Karl Rahm (executed in Litoměřice on 30 April 1947).

The executive body of the Council of Elders was an extensive bureaucratic apparatus with a number of departments and sub-departments. Reports on reorganization in the self-government are contained in the Daily Orders (Tagesbefehle, later renamed Mitteilungen der jüdischen Selbstverwaltung – Jewish Self-Government Reports), which were issued by the Council of Elders. A very important archive source, the Daily Orders provide a wealth of information about ghetto events and activities, organizational changes in the self-government, the arrival and departure of transports and the daily life of inmates.

At the outset, the ghetto administration was divided into two main departments – General Administration (Allgemeinverwaltung) and Administration of Buildings (Gebaudeverwaltung), both with various sub-departments.

Over time, other departments and sub-departments were set up – Records and Statistics and the Labour Centre, for example, at the beginning of 1942. The Security Service was founded in June 1942 after the expulsion of the civilian population.

The preserved archive documents in the Terezín Collection are arranged according to the structure of the Terezín self-government from 1944, which had nine main departments, from which various amounts of documents have been preserved:

- Management (Leitung)
- Labour Centre (Arbeitszentrale)
- Internal Administration Department (Abteilung für innere Verwaltung)
- Economic Department (Wirtschaftsabteilung)
- Technical Department (Technische Abteilung)
- Finance Department (Financ Abteilung)
- Health Service and Care (Gesundheitswesen und Fürsorge)
- Youth Care (Jugendfürsorge)
- Cultural Department (Freizeitgestaltung)

MANAGEMENT

The Office of the Jewish Elder and his representatives, the Security Service (Sicherheitswesen), the Central Records Office, the Bank of the Jewish Self-Government and the Central Secretariat were the Management's principal departments.

The Security Service comprised the Ghetto Guard (Ghettowache, also known as the Gemeindewache and Ordnerwache), the Detective Division (Kriminalpolizei, Kripo, or Krminalwache), the Fire and Air-Raid Protection Division and the Economic Control Office (Wirtschaftsüberwachungsstelle).

The Central Records Office with its various departments dealt with the personal affairs of inmates and with the state of the ghetto. It gathered reports and statistical overviews about ghetto conditions and prepared statistics for the camp commander. It also kept transport documents and had access to the central and family card indexes.

The Bank of the Jewish Self-Government merely served the interests of Nazi propaganda. It issued fake wage and payment slips and, in the spring of 1943, introduced a special currency, called Ghettogeld, which was used to 'pay' the salaries of inmates, each of whom received a 'passbook'.

The Central Secretariat was an important part of the Jewish self-government. The Jewish Elder's executive body, it had authority over the Management's other departments and over the main departments of the self-government's other sections. Its mailing room received correspondence for the Jewish Elder and its copying room made out the Daily Orders. It also had a Complaints Department, a Personnel Office and Archive. Of particular importance was the Transport Department (Transportabteilung), which kept transport-related documents and prepared transport lists to the East in accordance with the camp commander's instructions.

LABOUR CENTRE

The Labour Centre was mainly responsible for involving inmates in the work process. Labour was compulsory for all those between the ages of 16 and 60, but inmates as young as 14 and as old as age of 65 were also put to work. The department kept a register of prisoners who were capable of work and were included in permanent or mobile labour squads. It also saw to the care of labourers by providing, for example, special food rations and working clothes. As well as doing necessary work for the ghetto, prisoners were also forced to work for the camp commander, gendarmes, Wehrmacht and several German firms.

INTERNAL ADMINISTRATION DEPARTMENT

This department had several divisions: a legal division (including a criminal section), criminal court, labour and service court, conciliation court, inheritance division and a section dealing with matters of guardianship. Of importance to the life of the prisoners was the Building Use Department (Raumwirtschaft, lit. "spatial economy"), which had an overview of, and authority to allot, accommodation and other facilities, as well as keeping statistical reports. The Building Administration (Gebäudeverwaltung, or Gebäudeleitung) was responsible for cleaning the camp, among other things, as well as helping the elderly and sick and dealing with complaints. This department had a number of offices in various buildings.

The Internal Administration Department also included a division dealing with the Register of Births, Marriages, Deaths and Burials, as well as an office that maintained a card index on the state of the ghetto's population, the Postal Service and Transportation Division (Post und Verkehr) and the Transport Administration (Transportleitung), which arranged the transportation of people and goods within the ghetto and provided assistance with incoming and outgoing transports.

ECONOMIC DEPARTMENT

This department was the self-government's largest department in terms of organization.–It included a Central Office, which distributed and allotted food to the prisoners through nine provisions offices. It included a potato-peeling section, as well as its own production facilities, such as a bakery.

The Central Administration of Materials and Inventories (Zentralmaterial und Inventarverwaltung) oversaw the needs of the various buildings. It had several sub-groups.

The Production Department (Wirtschaftsabteilung Produktion) had a complex structure with many sub-sections, in addition to its own secretariat, technical laboratory and administration. Other departments included a head office, which was divided into sections according to activity, and a Farming Department (Landwirtschaft). There were also storehouses and craft workshops here. Shipping (Spedition) was a separate department.

TECHNICAL DEPARTMENT

The Technical Department secured various construction and technical works in the ghetto. It included the Construction Division, which undertook minor reconstructions, and the Public Works Division, which among other things supervised the construction of railway sidings from Bohušovice to Terezín and the construction of roads. The Public Enterprises Division saw to the supply of electricity and water and to the maintenance of the sewer system. The Technical Department also included a Central Office of Building Maintenance, as well as a Print and Reproduction Department, which prepared various designs and sketches and employed a number of famous artists.

DEPARTMENT OF FINANCE

This was a relatively small department with a simple organizational structure, which mainly dealt with financial operations for the other departments. Although its services were required, it was basically of no importance.

HEALTH AND CARE

This department was of great importance to the lives of Terezín prisoners, for whom it did its best in the difficult conditions of the ghetto. Many outstanding, selfless doctors and health workers were active in the ghetto.

The Health Service and Care departments included an administrative body that was in charge of the specialist facilities and services – the Central Library, lectures, education and staff records. The Department for the Care of the Sick (Krankenbetreuung) was in charge of the health facilities (hospital and out-patients' department), a group of stretcher bearers, a pharmacy and an infectious laundry room. The Laboratory and Auxiliary Facilities Department included the central dental facilities, a dissecting room and a central section for laundry and bedding.

Of great importance were the Sanitary Facilities, which were responsible for hygiene and disinfection. This department was divided into a number of sections, including the Disinfestation Section (Entwesung), which was vital to the health of prisoners.

The Official Doctor Unit dealt with basic health matters at Terezín, particularly in connection with hygiene. This included health statistics records, vaccination records, health prevention and food hygiene. Autopsy records were also kept here almost throughout the duration of the ghetto; these are an interesting source of information on the fate of many of the prisoners.

The Care Division (Fürsorge) was, to a large extent, a separate department. It had its own offices, staff registers and other sections. Its task was to look after the oldest prisoners and the physically and mentally handicapped. It had a group of ten facilities (Fürsorgestelle).

YOUTH CARE

The Youth Care Department looked after young prisoners at Terezín. Its various sections, including health care, were of great importance for life in the ghetto. Where possible, it eased the conditions of incarceration for young people in the ghetto. A number of outstanding and selfless tutors worked here.

The department was divided into four sections. The Management and Office Administration issued wages, registered the names of children and young people and saw to various official matters. The Technical Section was responsible for accommodation, staff records, organizational matters and inspection. The Care and Education Section (Erziehungsbetreuung) comprised an education board, a work education group, daily employment and culture care. This section was in charge of the library and reading room and organized various cultural activities for children. The Social Care Section (Sozialbetreuung) saw to the material needs of young people. The Social Administration (Sozialadministrative) took care of young workers and included the Nutrition Section (Ernährung), which secured food rations and other provisions for young prisoners. Of importance was the Group of Homes (Heime, Heimbetreuung) where children and young people lived under the care of tutor guardians. This group included a home for special needs children and a house for apprentices.

The records of the Youth Care Department also included documents that were drawn up outside the office of the Terezín self-government. The result of the enthusiastic voluntary work of prisoners – young people’s guardians, teachers and prominent personages – these were mainly related to the clandestine classes that were held in the ghetto. This includes children’s homework assignments, teachers’ marks, readers, teaching aids prepared by the inmates, reports on the activities of the various homes and children’s magazines.

CULTURAL DEPARTMENT

The Cultural Department was also divided into a number of sections. In addition to the Management and Administration Section with its own secretariat and sub-section for the preparation of programmes and the Technical Services, there were also activity-based sections.

The Theatre Section had an art council and several sub-sections (Czech, German and Yiddish theatre, cabaret, performances in housing blocks). The Music Section was organized by genre (opera, orchestral works, etc.) and included a café programme and the upkeep and supply of musical instruments. There was also a Lecture Section, which provided talks on a wide range of topics. A separate part of the Cultural Department was the Central Library, which contained a large amount of specialist literature and fiction that had been sent to Terezín from a number of abolished Jewish communities, Jewish institutions and private collections. As well as a reading room, there were also a mobile library and a library for children and young people. The Cultural Department was also in charge of the Sports Section, the Inspection and External Services Section (Kontrol und Aussendienst) and the Hall Facilities.

In addition to official documents, there are also extant programmes for various cultural events and entrance tickets, scripts for theatre plays (mainly fragments), music scores, lists of lectures (including some lecture texts), diaries, albums and literary work by children, young people and adults.

Various documents from the self-government's individual departments have been preserved. Most of the extant documents, particularly order forms, delivery notes and receipts, are from the Economic Department. There are only a few documents from the Finance and Technical departments.

The list of activities of the main departments and the many sub-sections of the Terezín self-government may give the impression that Terezín was an ordinary municipality where life was the same as in any other independent town. Terezín, however, was not an open town, its inhabitants were not able to leave freely and most of them were later deported to the East, from where only a few returned. The entire bureaucratic apparatus of the ghetto was purely fictive. Although its staff worked hard, they could secure only very limited living conditions for the prisoners and, in any case, were not able to give them freedom or to save their lives.

The Terezín Council of Elders and its extensive official apparatus became a large bureaucratic office. A job with the council was much sought after, as its staff and their families were to some extent protected from being deported to the East.

The actual powers of the self-government were very limited, relating only to a few internal matters within the bounds set by the camp commander (e.g., accommodating prisoners and allocating food rations among the various categories of ghetto inhabitants). The Jewish Elder appeared to have relatively extensive powers, but these were limited by the camp commander. Each day he was required to report to the commander for his orders. No minutes were taken of meetings; it was only after they had ended that the Council of Elders made a subsequent record (Aktenvermerk).

Apart from a few exceptions, the vast majority of Bohemian and Moravian Jews from the then Protectorate of Bohemia and Moravia went through the Terezín ghetto. Only seven transports and a small group of employees of the Prague Jewish Community were sent directly to the East (Lodz, Minsk, Ujazdow, Auschwitz). Jews deported to the Terezín ghetto from Germany and Austria were mainly the elderly, smaller groups of prominent people, those holding military decorations and disabled First World War veterans.
